

“The big questions”

Most individuals exist as a complicated interaction of rational and irrational belief systems, competing emotions and physical wants and aversions. The complex to the individual's psyche is too... complicated, to permit an obvious overall want.

If one's beliefs were 100% objective, an interaction of probabilities extracted unemotionally from available data, and one's exact hierarchy of want in interaction with those beliefs 100% understood accurately, what would you want most of all that is possible to achieve? That is plausible to achieve?

Whom or what you love will likely be a primary determinant. Another will be the pursuit of pleasure and safety from harm.

Until the basic question of what one wants can be answered, determining the meaning of life for you (to achieve what you want), pursuit of anything is as approximal to utter chaos as the distance between yourself and that answer.